Abstract:

Traditionally, speech therapy has been implemented through drill, flashcards, and table time. But recently, there has been a shift towards play based approaches in our profession. What are some of the benefits of using play in therapy? What does the research say? And most importantly, how can you introduce play in your sessions in a way that is meaningful and productive?

About the Speaker:

Primarily trained in Australia, Imogen initially came to Hong Kong on a university scholarship and returned to the city upon the completion of her degree. Her honours thesis explored the implementation of the Lidcombe Program with Mandarin speaking children in mainland China. Imogen currently works in private practice and is passionate about making speech and language therapy an enjoyable experience for everyone involved.
